In the early part of September, 1954, directors of Yugoslav technical schools which admit students on the basis of competitive examinations received confidential orders from the authorities containing new provisions for evaluating the candidates. These orders provide that, in addition to the evaluations of the students' examinations, their family backgrounds must also be considered. A certain number of points are to be added to the evaluations of students who come from poor families, whose parents are members of the Federation of Communists of Yugoslavia or whose parents were with the Partisans during the war.
